Security Analysis Report: Japan (June 22, 2026 - June 29, 2026)

Executive Summary

During the period of June 22-29, 2026, Japan significantly advanced its defense posture and strategic capabilities amidst escalating regional tensions. Key developments included participation in major US-led military exercises, a legislative move to rename the Air Self-Defense Force to include space operations, and the consideration of nationalizing defense equipment production facilities. Diplomatic relations with South Korea saw a cautious rapprochement with renewed defense talks, while ties with China deteriorated further due evidenced by Beijing's blacklisting of Japanese defense entities. Cybersecurity remained a high priority, with new strategies adopted to counter state-backed threats and AI-driven risks. These actions collectively underscore Japan's accelerated shift towards a more assertive and self-reliant security policy in a complex geopolitical landscape.

Key Security Developments

- Major US-Japan Military Exercises

From June 22 to July 1, Japan participated in the US-led Valiant Shield 2026 military exercise, which included the deployment of US Typhon intermediate-range missile systems and HIMARS rocket launchers to Japan's Kanoya Air Base in Kagoshima Prefecture. Simultaneously, Japan's Ground Self-Defense Force and the US Marine Corps commenced the Resolute Dragon "island defense" exercise across the Kyushu region and Okinawa Prefecture from June 22 to June 30. These exercises highlight the deepening military integration between the US and Japan and Japan's increasing role as a frontline operational platform in the "first island chain."

- Multilateral Naval Drills in the Western Pacific

The Japan Maritime Self-Defense Force (JMSDF) conducted a multilateral exercise as part of its Indo-Pacific Deployment 2026 (IPD26) unit with the Italian Navy, Republic of Korea Navy, Republic of Singapore Navy, Philippine Navy, and Philippine Coast Guard in the Western Pacific from June 12-20. This exercise aimed to improve JMSDF's tactical capabilities and strengthen cooperation with participating navies, contributing to a "Free and Open Indo-Pacific" vision.

- Joint Chinese and Russian Air Patrol Near Japan

On June 27, more than 10 Chinese and Russian military aircraft, including four Chinese H-6 bombers, two Russian Tu-95 bombers, and fighter jets, conducted a joint patrol near Japan, prompting both Japan and South Korea to scramble fighter jets. Japanese Defense Minister Shinjiro Koizumi expressed concern, stating that these repeated joint bomber flights signify an "expansion and intensification of activities around Japan" and a "strong show of force."

- Reorganization of Air Self-Defense Force to Include Space Operations

On June 26, Japan's parliament enacted a bill to reorganize the Air Self-Defense Force (ASDF) into the Air and Space Self-Defense Force. This move, marking the first name change for any branch of the Self-Defense Forces since 1954, aims to significantly enhance Japan's capabilities for space operations, recognizing the growing importance of space in national security.

- Consideration of Nationalizing Defense Equipment Production

The Japanese government is planning to consider nationalizing defense equipment production facilities to ensure sustained manufacturing capacity during emergencies. This plan, expected to be included in new economic and fiscal management guidelines and updated security documents, is a direct response to lessons from conflicts like the Russia-Ukraine war, which highlighted the necessity of continuous combat capability.

- Development of Japan's Own Foreign Military Sales Program

Japan is exploring the creation of its own version of the U.S. Foreign Military Sales (FMS) program to expand exports of its defense products. This initiative follows the April 2026 abolition of five categories of restrictions on arms exports, allowing for the first time since World War II the export of lethal weapons to countries with classified defense equipment and technology agreements with Japan.

- New Cybersecurity Strategy and AI Basic Plan Revision

Japan formally adopted a new cybersecurity strategy to guide national policy for the next five years, focusing on strengthening coordination across civilian, law enforcement, and defense institutions. The strategy explicitly identifies cyber operations linked to China, Russia, and North Korea as "serious threats." Additionally, a draft revision of Japan's AI Basic Plan was released on June 27, proposing closer international cooperation and expanded measures to address cyber threats and AI-generated misinformation.

- Deterioration of Japan-China Relations and Chinese Blacklisting

On June 29, China's Commerce Ministry blacklisted 20 Japanese companies and organizations, including the National Institute for Defense Studies and Mitsubishi-affiliated defense contractors, from its export control list. Beijing cited Japan's "remilitarization" and alleged nuclear ambitions as justifications, further escalating tensions that have been strained since Prime Minister Sanae Takaichi's remarks in November regarding potential Japanese military intervention in a Taiwan crisis.

- Cautious Rapprochement with South Korea

Despite lingering historical disputes, Japanese Defense Minister Shinjiro Koizumi and South Korean counterpart Ahn Gyu-back met in Seoul on June 28. They reaffirmed commitment to the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula and agreed to enhance defense cooperation, including the revival of joint search-and-rescue drills and considering routine refueling support for South Korea's Black Eagles aerobatic team. However, a bilateral Acquisition and Cross-Servicing Agreement (ACSA) remains difficult due to South Korean public sentiment.

- Focus on Drone Acquisition and Missile Defense Modernization

Japan launched an acquisition program for interceptor drones on June 24, seeking to rapidly procure units to protect military facilities and vessels from drone threats, with demonstrations scheduled for late July and early August. Concurrently, Japan is continuing to modernize its missile defense capabilities, with plans to equip Maya-class guided-missile destroyers with Raytheon SM-6 missiles and enhance PAC-3 MSE interceptors with the Lower Tier Air and Missile Defense Sensor (LTAMDS).

- Strait of Hormuz Security Concerns

Following a US-Iran peace deal, Japan remains undecided on sending its military to assist with mine clearance and ensure safe passage through the Strait of Hormuz. Japanese shipowners, represented by Hitoshi Nagasawa, president of the Japanese Shipowners' Association, emphasized on June 22 that the resumption of navigation is conditional on a complete end to the war and confirmed mine removal operations, as naval mines are believed to have been laid along shipping routes.

Geopolitical Impact and Regional Dynamics

Japan's security developments during this period reflect a determined effort to bolster its defense capabilities and influence regional security dynamics, largely driven by perceived threats from China and North Korea, and with strong backing from the United States. The participation in major US-led exercises like Valiant Shield and Resolute Dragon, along with the deployment of US intermediate-range missile systems to Japanese soil, signals a deepening of the US-Japan alliance and positions Japan as a critical component of the "first island chain" defense strategy. This enhanced military posture, however, is viewed by China as a dangerous step towards "remilitarization," leading to further deterioration in bilateral relations, as evidenced by China's blacklisting of Japanese defense entities. The joint Chinese and Russian air patrols near Japan underscore a growing alignment between Beijing and Moscow, presenting a unified challenge to Japan's security and regional stability.

The cautious rapprochement with South Korea, marked by renewed defense talks and agreement on joint search-and-rescue drills, is a positive step for trilateral cooperation with the US, aiming to present a more united front against North Korea's nuclear ambitions. However, historical grievances continue to impede full bilateral defense integration, such as the stalled Acquisition and Cross-Servicing Agreement. Japan's proactive stance in developing its own FMS program and exploring defense equipment exports, coupled with the consideration of nationalizing defense production, indicates a strategic shift towards becoming a more significant defense industrial player in the Indo-Pacific. This could reshape regional arms markets and supply chains, potentially offering alternatives to traditional suppliers.

Overall, Japan's actions are contributing to a more militarized and strategically complex East Asia. While strengthening deterrence and reassuring allies, these moves also risk intensifying a regional arms race and hardening geopolitical divisions, particularly with China. The focus on space operations and active cybersecurity measures highlights the evolving nature of warfare and Japan's commitment to maintaining a technological edge in critical domains.

Military and Defense Analysis

Japan's military and defense strategy is undergoing a significant transformation, moving away from its post-war pacifist constraints towards a more proactive and robust defense posture. The legislative changes, such as the renaming of the Air Self-Defense Force to the Air and Space Self-Defense Force, directly reflect the growing importance of space operations in national security and the need for integrated all-domain operational capabilities. This shift is also evident in the ongoing revisions to Japan's three foundational security documents, which are expected to call for substantial increases in defense spending, the removal of arms export restrictions, and a major expansion of offensive military capabilities, including "counterstrike capabilities" and long-range missiles.

Modernization programs are heavily focused on missile defense and unmanned systems. Japan is actively enhancing its layered air- and missile-defense architecture, including plans to equip Maya-class destroyers with Raytheon SM-6 missiles and integrate the Lower Tier Air and Missile Defense Sensor (LTAMDS) with PAC-3 MSE interceptors to counter hypersonic glide vehicles. The rapid procurement of interceptor drones is a critical development to counter emerging drone threats to military facilities and vessels. Defense spending continues to rise, exceeding 9 trillion yen ($55.66 billion) in the latest budget, marking the fourteenth consecutive annual increase. This increased spending is directed towards developing long-range offensive missiles, expanding drone forces, and strengthening military deployments in the Southwest Islands, including new missile bases and radar facilities in areas like Okinawa. The consideration of nationalizing defense equipment production facilities further underscores Japan's commitment to bolstering its domestic defense industrial base and ensuring sustained combat operations in a contingency.

Outlook and Forecast

Short-term trends (1-3 months): In the immediate future, Japan is likely to continue its robust schedule of joint military exercises with the United States and other regional partners, particularly in the Western Pacific and around the Ryukyu Islands. The ongoing Valiant Shield and Resolute Dragon exercises will conclude in early July, followed by Japan's participation in RIMPAC 2026 through July 31. We can anticipate further details emerging regarding the proposed FMS-like program and the nationalization of defense production facilities, potentially with initial legislative steps or public consultations. The demonstrations for interceptor drones are scheduled for late July and early August, which could lead to rapid procurement decisions. Tensions with China are expected to remain elevated, with Beijing likely to continue its rhetoric against Japan's defense build-up and potentially implement further economic or diplomatic pressures.

Critical flashpoints and risk areas: The East China Sea, particularly around the Senkaku/Diaoyu Islands, remains a critical flashpoint due to China's increasing maritime presence and coercive activities. The Taiwan Strait is another high-risk area, given Prime Minister Takaichi's previous statements on potential Japanese military involvement in a Taiwan contingency and China's strong objections. The increased frequency of joint Chinese and Russian military patrols near Japan's airspace and maritime zones poses a continuous risk of miscalculation or escalation. Cybersecurity threats, particularly from state-backed actors (China, Russia, North Korea) exploiting AI, represent a persistent and evolving risk to Japan's critical infrastructure and financial systems. The Strait of Hormuz, despite a recent US-Iran peace deal, remains a potential flashpoint for maritime security, with Japan's energy supply vulnerable to disruptions.

Indicators to monitor: Key indicators to monitor include the progress of the revisions to Japan's three security documents and the associated defense spending increases. Any further Chinese retaliatory measures or military provocations in response to Japan's defense build-up will be crucial. The implementation details and timelines for Japan's new FMS-like program and the nationalization of defense production will indicate the pace of its defense industrial expansion. Developments in Japan-South Korea defense cooperation, especially regarding the ACSA, will signal the extent of regional security alignment. Finally, the frequency and nature of cyberattacks targeting Japan, particularly those leveraging AI, will be important to track.

Strategic recommendations: Japan should continue to strengthen its alliances, particularly with the United States, while actively pursuing trilateral and multilateral security frameworks in the Indo-Pacific to enhance collective deterrence. Diplomatic efforts should focus on de-escalation with China where possible, while firmly defending national interests and international law. Investing in advanced intelligence capabilities, including the "new prewar-style intelligence system" being developed, is crucial for early warning and threat assessment. Prioritizing domestic defense industrial capacity, through initiatives like the FMS-like program and potential nationalization, will enhance self-reliance and supply chain resilience. Finally, a robust and adaptive cybersecurity strategy, with a strong focus on AI-driven threats and public-private collaboration, is essential to protect critical infrastructure and national security.
